E-Discovery

E-Discovery Basics

By now you've heard all about e-discovery even if you haven't yet undertaken a project. E-discovery refers to the retrieval of documents that exist as electronic files rather than paper documents. These could be word processing files, email messages, spreadsheets, database information or any other digital file format. However, the entire e-discovery process extends beyond simply retrieving this data — it encompasses the analysis, gathering, processing, reviewing and production of electronic discovery materials.

Not only do you need to recover information from computers, but you also need that information in a usable and searchable format.

The Data Company Advantage

With 30 years of experience in litigation support, our technology experts know how to manage large-scale document projects — whether those documents arrive as electronic or hard-copy files.

More than 90% of all business documents exist electronically, many of which are never printed. Litigators must create an e-discovery plan to manage their cases in a client's best interests and to stay ahead of the opposition.

The Data Company is a critical part of that successful plan. We can process the electronic documents using the highest discovery standards. And we can thoroughly examine the network to ensure compliance with the discovery order. We will then convert the documents to manageable text and graphic files that blend seamlessly with the scanned documents for each case.

Even if emails and documents were previously erased from a computer or have become corrupt, it may still be possible to unearth that data and render it into an easily understandable format using forensic e-discovery methods and software.

Final Product

Search through the data quickly to find the exact information you need at any given time. If you choose to host the database through DataLawyer, our online hosting service, you have access to your information anyplace, anytime.
